AFTER having attended the radically expressive arts and lifestyle festival Burning Man in the United States and coming away feeling empowered and seeing more clearly what really matters in life, I returned to South-east Asia in search of its Asian equivalent.

Friends said Wonderfruit would be the closest I would get to a gathering that celebrated life, embraced differences and encouraged human connection.

I bought myself a ticket for it right away.

The four-day festival held every December in the rice fields of Pattaya in Thailand touts itself as an arts, music, food and lifestyle festival.

It began in 2014 with a mission of encouraging sustainability and social responsibility but has developed on so much more.

Wonderfruit seems like a luxury compared to Burning Man. Rather than roughing it out in the Nevada desert, you can have air-conditioning in your tent, proper bathroom and shower facilities.

Plus, you don't have to bring your own food and drink, and can purchase meals with a topped-up wristband at the many stalls on the grounds.

It is the perfect introduction for those new to alternative lifestyle festivals.

The best way to describe the Wonderfruit experience is that it is a journey in regeneration.

In the day, there are ample opportunities for you to strengthen your body and mind with health and wellness workshops and self-reflection through the arts.

By night, it offers a cathartic experience, allowing you to release your inhibitions through music that pulsates from its half-a-dozen stages.

Health and wellness

The festival offers the perfect opportunity to attend meditation, yoga and breathing classes taught by instructors from around the world.

There are workshops almost every hour from 7am to 9pm. Participants at the festival, called "wanderers", can go to as many of these workshops as they wish, as long as there is still space in the arena.

There are some 10,000 wanderers yearly, so it pays to show up early.

I attended a session in Kriya Yoga, a rainbow chakra meditation session and a lesson in the Russian-originated Strelnikova breathing technique — all designed to help participants focus on their life energy and self-heal.

A class in laughing meditation was another unusual experience.

Lying on our backs, we were told to laugh in different ways, sometimes deep, sometimes high and cackling, for 10 solid minutes before lying still and becoming aware of the silence.

Most of us ended up out of breath and feeling strangely entertained.

One of the festival's most popular workshops could well have been the gong bath that took place twice a day.

During this therapeutic session, the instructor asked us to lie down and relax as she struck a gong, sometimes softly and other times more intensely.

It felt like gentle waves were sweeping over me, and when the rhythm intensified, I felt a wall of waves crash down on me, swiftly erasing all my fears and apprehensions and relaxing my mind.

Following the crowd, we walked towards a giant sculpture of a budding fruit located in the middle of an expansive field, lit up in an ever-changing myriad of colours.

Electric dance music pumped out in surround sound by the DJ at the petal-shaped main stage, as strobe lights whizzed past our heads.

The dreamscape-like atmosphere revved up the crowd and our energy levels climbed as we danced to our hearts' content.

Wonderfruit offers a unique experience to those who go with an open heart and mind.

There is a reason why its tagline reads, "Live, Love, Wonder" — it gives us a chance to quiet our minds, reflect on our lives, and let ourselves go, if only for a while.

Four Wonderfruit days might just keep you going for the rest of the year.
